

RESOURCE ACCOUNTS

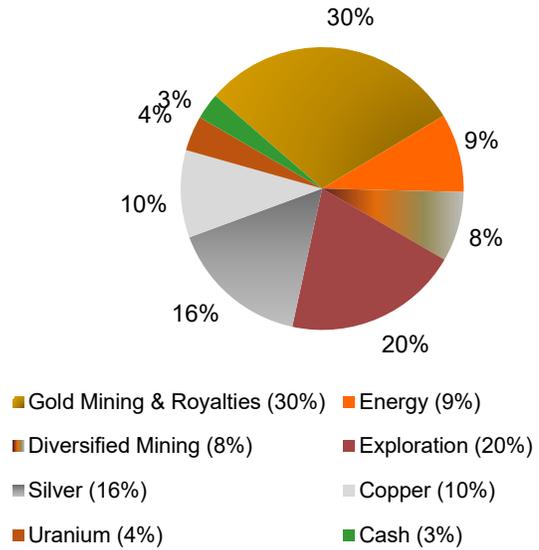

Resources are an essential component of life. Everything we use is either grown or mined. There is a secular trend towards higher demand, with growth in Asia and other “emerging” areas. China is a dominant consumer of many commodities, including oil and copper (#1 in the world in both). Demand can be volatile, however, while supply can be particularly erratic.

Because of both supply and demand patterns, resources are extremely cyclical, providing for significant gains as well as risks. An investor should be prepared for considerable volatility which is inherent in this sector.

Our Resource Accounts can invest in the broad range of resources. At most times, the emphasis will be on producers of the metals, as well as quality exploration companies. Because of the cyclical nature of resource markets, at various times, different commodities may dominate an account.

Outsized gains can only be achieved if one is prepared for this. The long-term factors remain intact. There remains a paucity of major new projects for many metals. Now, as economies begin to emerge from the economic restrictions of 2020, demand has picked up again, particularly in China, with an emphasis on resource required both for infrastructure, and for electrification (of the power grid and of vehicles). We are emphasizing these resources, particularly copper, nickel and silver, in addition to gold. We are also building positions in oil & gas. The Russian invasion of Ukraine saw most commodities jump in price. In some commodities, Russia and its ally Belarus, as well as Ukraine are significant sources of supply, including wheat, potash, oil and gas, nickel and palladium. Once the war ends and sanctions are lifted, the prices of some of these commodities could retreat. But the longer-term fundamentals for most remain positive, and we shall use that opportunity to buy.
