

■ AGGRESSIVE ACCOUNTS

An aggressive account is suitable for the person who can allocate a part of his overall portfolio to high-risk (and high-potential) investments, implying that he can tolerate volatility and even potential loss of capital. Whether such an account objective is appropriate depends on an individual's circumstances: age, financial circumstances and obligations, earning power now and in the future, and so on, as well as the fortitude to tolerate risk.

Aggressive accounts by their nature are more volatile than more conservative accounts, and thus a longer-term view is important. Some clients open an aggressive account with a portion of their portfolio, keeping the rest under a more conservative objective. We take a global view, including emerging markets, and prefer undervalued stocks with long-term potential to frequent short-term trading, so patience is required. Having said that, aggressive accounts tend to have more trading than more conservative accounts.

Where authorized by clients, we use options to maximize gains. Frequently, aggressive accounts invest in markets or sectors that are out of favor at the time. We are not afraid of high concentrations in aggressive accounts, which tend to be less diversified than more conservative accounts. Aggressive accounts also tend to have less current income, but instead look for capital appreciation. At this time, most broad global markets are vulnerable. Our buying is focused on special situations, undervalued markets, and resources, especially gold. We focus on bottom-up analysis, looking for great companies in any market or sector.
